

Kicking off our prototype tours!

With great excitement, the Liverpool Health and Academic Precinct prototype rooms have been unveiled to give staff a first-hand experience of their future workspaces.

Liverpool Hospital Acting General Manager Scott McGrath said staff were delighted with the new look and function of their new workspaces.

Each of the spaces were designed after extensive consultation with staff, community representatives, and feedback from clinicians to ensure the rooms will be fit for purpose.

Members of the Allied Health team geared up and ready to view their future work spaces.

“We’ve seen lots of artist impressions and plans of the future building but this is the first real opportunity for our staff to get onto the construction site, test the design and layout of their future workspaces, and ask lots of questions,” he said.

“It is fantastic to see our hospital redevelopment reach this stage and our staff are so excited to experience their future workspaces and provide feedback before the final versions are built.”

There are nine prototype rooms including a purpose-built Neonatal Intensive Care Unit, Special Care Nursery, a birthing suite (with and without a bath), consulting room, treatment room, a cancer treatment bay, staff station, and a secondary staff station.

Catch the team at the next community expo

The Liverpool Health and Academic Precinct project team has been actively engaging with local communities in south western Sydney and recently participated in the Pathways to Employment Expo in Fairfield.

The event was a success with more than 1000 guests on the day and included a talk from then Liverpool Hospital General Manager Karen McMenamin who highlighted the diverse range of roles and opportunities available at the hospital.

“We have a new hospital building coming next year, and we need more staff than just doctors and clinicians,” Ms McMenamin said.

“We need people who can work in fields like ICT, kitchen, general services, nurses, corporate, community engagement positions, and much, much more.”

The project team shared a stall with South Western Sydney Local Health District’s Multicultural Services – as part of the LHAP multicultural community engagement activities and is already planning to attend the next Pathways to Employment Expo in November.

We are reaching our construction milestones! Last month we farewelled Binyang, the 52-metre tower crane that helped build our first four-storey hospital building.
